In previous years, I've thought about hosting a nonfiction challenge, but I've been able to find existing challenges that made doing so seem redundant. That's not the case this year, so I'm excited to announce that I'll be hosting a nonfiction reading challenge! The goals will be flexible and I'll be putting together several events throughout the year to help participants connect with each other. Suggested Goals. Rather than suggest particular levels for this challenge, I've got a couple ideas for different nonfiction reading goals you could set for yourself. Read X nonfiction books. Read X% n... Memoir continues to be important – perhaps too important? – to publishers, who will doubtless have been encouraged by the way it dominated the nonfiction prize shortlists in 2016, all but pushing aside traditional biography. The one I'm looking forward to more than any other is The Rules Do Not Apply by Ariel Levy (Fleet), which tells the story of how its journalist author built a successful and unconventional (by some standards) life, only to watch it crumble to dust.
