
Natalie Pearson, Lakeridge High School

Start Date
29-4-2014 9:00 AM

End Date
29-4-2014 10:15 AM

Disciplines
History of Science, Technology, and Medicine | Social History | United States History | Women's History

Subjects

Description
In 1965, the last remaining anticontraceptive law in the United States was made unconstitutional in Griswold v. Connecticut. Despite widespread acceptance of the use of contraceptives, Connecticut legislatures put up incredible resistance to the sexual revolution of the 1960s and subsequent demand that the statute--outlawing individual use of contraceptives--be removed. This paper asserts Connecticut's foundation as a haven for Protestant values as the reason for this determined resistance to the acceptance of contraceptives.

Persistent Identifier
http://archives.pdx.edu/ds/psu/11207